Dr Rachel Aldred's research has directly shaped the transformation in Transport for London's (TfL) cycling policy over the last decade, helping to increase cycling spend from 50p to £10 per head and the development of improved guidance for designing cycling infrastructure in London. Her research led to the creation of London's first international-quality 'cycle superhighways', providing segregated cycle tracks that separate cyclists from motor traffic.

Cycling & Society 2017 □ Overview | Cycling and Society

Initially, I viewed cycling as a means to an end; I was dieting and needed to move my body regularly, and my journey to and from work was 45 minutes of unused exercise potential that didn't eat into my social life (excuse the pun). So I bought myself a bike - a pretty one, of course, not a functional one - and set about cycling to and from ...
