We know this because it's a long-standing convention in formal diplomatic interpreting that each side brings its own interpreter, usually of its own nationality.

This has advantages: * Confidence and confidentiality: each side feels it can trust its interpreter to work in its best interest and not divulge confidential information

Unprofessional Translation: Diplomatic Interpreters

Interpretation is in itself a diplomatic endeavour. The interpreter's job is very different to that of a translator. Translators work alone, facing a white sheet of paper and a text. They recreate the text by becoming its second author, understanding and recreating the author's writing skills, possibly referring to other works by the author in order to better grasp his/her style

Diplomatic interpreters: part of history in the making. A number of personalities stand out in the history of diplomatic interpretation. One such individual who is no longer with us interpreted for several French presidents during diplomatic talks with Germany. He used to say, “I am a non-entity” and “a good interpreter is a necessary evil.”
