Slide Rule: Autobiography of an Engineer - Wikipedia

Slide Rule is Shute's personal memoir of the early days of flight and the air industry in Great Britain. His writing is clear and concise, even if it's not meant for people, like myself, who have no familiarity with some of the technical terms.

Slide Rule by Nevil Shute - Goodreads

By William McCandless. Slide Rule was published in 1954 and represented Nevil Shute's selected remembrances from childhood to 1938. One fascinating thing about Slide Rule is the parallels and examples that one can draw to the fiction Mr. Shute produced during this period and later. After receiving a British Public School education at Shrewsbury School and Baliol College, Oxford; and a brief period at Military Academy at Sandhurst, he went to work for the De Havilland Co. from 1920 to 1924.

Shute gives a detailed account of the development of the two airships in his 1954 autobiographical work, Slide Rule. His account is very critical of the R101 design and management team, and strongly hints that senior team members were complicit in concealing flaws in the airship's design and construction.

Nevil Shute - Wikipedia

In 1938, with war brewing and orders for aircraft for the RAF in the hundreds, the Board of the company dispensed with Nevil Shute's services, an action which he says in his autobiography 'Slide Rule' (1954) was probably quite right - his forte was as a starter of companies and not a runner.

Apparently, the notoriety of the R101 airship is due partly to author Nevil Shute, who wrote about it in his autobiography The Slide Rule. Shute, who spent his last decade in Australia, also wrote On the Beach, the 1959 film adaptation of which incidentally contains some brilliant black-and-white footage of empty Melbourne CBD streets after the fallout cloud eventually reaches the city and ...
